BACKGROUND

On June 4, 2018, the U.S. Supreme Court issued its ruling in the Masterpiece Cakeshop v. Colorado Civil Rights Commission. The case involved a business—one that is open to the public—that refused to sell a cake to a couple for their wedding reception because they are gay. The central question in the case was whether laws against discrimination can continue to be enforced without sweeping exemptions.

But the 2018 ruling did not definitively resolve this question. Rather, the Court’s ruling was narrow and reversed the original ruling by the Colorado Civil Rights Commission, in which the bakery was fined for violating the state’s nondiscrimination law. Why? Because the Supreme Court concluded that the commission had not acted impartially when originally considering the case. For that reason, this ruling applies only to Masterpiece Cakeshop and does not allow similar businesses to discriminate. Furthermore, it only applies to the past charges of discrimination against Masterpiece Cakeshop, but the decision does not grant Masterpiece Cakeshop a future right to discriminate.

The Court’s ruling also made clear the importance of nondiscrimination laws and the need to protect lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) people from discrimination. In the majority opinion, Associate Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote that “gay persons and gay couples cannot be treated as social outcasts or as inferior in dignity and worth,” affirming that “the exercise of their freedom on terms equal to others must be given great weight and respect by the courts.” Certain “religious and philosophical objections are protected,” Kennedy allowed, but “do not allow business owners and other actors in the economy and in society to deny protected persons equal access to goods and services.”

Overview of the Case

In 2012, David Mullins and Charlie Craig, accompanied by Craig’s mother, Debbie Munn, visited Masterpiece Cakeshop, a Denver area bakery, to order a cake for their wedding reception. Before even discussing the design of the cake, Jack Phillips, the bakery owner, told them he wouldn’t sell them a wedding cake because they were a same-sex couple.

Colorado state law prohibits all public accommodations, including businesses like Masterpiece Cakeshop, from refusing service to anyone based on their religion, race, sex, disability, age, national origin, marital status, creed, sexual orientation or gender identity. The couple filed a complaint with the Colorado Civil Rights Commission, which found the bakery had violated Colorado law by discriminating against Mullins and Craig.

The bakery admits that it had a policy of refusing service to gay couples seeking wedding cakes, but argues that it has a constitutional right to discriminate based on religious and free speech grounds. The Colorado state courts rejected this defense, and the bakery sought review of the state ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court, which agreed to hear the case.

The question before the Supreme Court was whether the Constitution provides a right to discriminate in violation of longstanding laws that apply to businesses that are open to the public, such as Masterpiece Cakeshop. In June, when the Court reversed the original ruling by the Colorado Civil Rights Commission, it did so on grounds that were unique to Masterpiece Cakeshop and this case, finding that the commission had not acted impartially when originally considering the case. As such, this ruling applies only to Masterpiece Cakeshop and does NOT broadly allow similar businesses to discriminate. Rather, the court affirmed that states can protect LGBT people from discrimination in the marketplace.

Laws like Colorado’s ensure that people previously subject to discrimination have the freedom to go about their day-to-day life without worrying whether they will be turned away from a business simply because of who they are. These laws provide access that goes far beyond cakes—including businesses and services that range from medical care to restaurants, from hotels to public transportation. A ruling that finds a right to discriminate would turn the Constitution’s promise of equal treatment under the law on its head. It could have implications far beyond LGBT people, and would jeopardize long-standing laws against discrimination across the country.
WHAT’S NEXT?

The business at the center of the Masterpiece Cakeshop case argued that the Constitution’s free speech protections should allow businesses with a creative element to refuse service to some people in violation of laws against discrimination. If the Supreme Court had agreed, any business that provides custom services or products could have claimed a right to violate local, state or federal laws against discrimination—and it likely wouldn’t have been limited to protections based on sexual orientation.

Because the Court’s ruling did not address this argument in its ruling, but rather focused on actions by the Colorado Civil Rights Commission, it is likely that the Court will be asked to consider these questions again in the near future. In fact, several similar cases are currently working their way through the courts. These cases, involving businesses that refuse to serve customers in violation of state nondiscrimination laws, could still drastically alter the landscape of nondiscrimination laws in the United States.

A loss in a future case like Masterpiece Cakeshop involving service refusals risks opening the door to much wider ranging forms of discrimination and people facing discrimination. In short, it could lead to the erosion of federal and state nondiscrimination protections across the country. Despite claims raised by those who want to be exempt from nondiscrimination laws that discrimination is not the intent of their lawsuit, the current political and cultural environment shows a clear increase in discrimination and hate violence—and it’s clear that these legal cases chip away at foundational nondiscrimination protections and embolden those who want to discriminate.

A ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court allowing discrimination in a case involving same-sex couples could next be used to support legal arguments enabling discrimination against women, minority faiths, and people of color—as well as LGBT people. Virtually all states—and the federal government—have laws prohibiting discrimination in public accommodations based on race, national origin and disability. Many states prohibit other forms of discrimination as well.

If the Supreme Court carves out a broad exemption in nondiscrimination laws for so-called “creative” enterprises, there could be an explosion of discrimination by restaurants, hair salons, event venues, funeral parlors and more. Sanctioning discrimination by so-called “creative” enterprises will only be a start of the march toward other businesses claiming a right to discriminate.

As Justice Kennedy wrote in the Masterpiece decision in June 2018:

Yet if that exception [for members of the clergy who do not want to perform a marriage] were not confined, then a long list of persons who provide goods and services for marriages and weddings might refuse to do so for gay persons, thus resulting in a community-wide stigma inconsistent with the history and dynamics of civil rights laws that ensure equal access to goods, services, and public accommodations.

The bakery in Masterpiece, and businesses in similar cases working through way through the courts, argue that their religious beliefs should exempt them from following nondiscrimination laws. If the Court agrees with this view, we could see an explosion of mistreatment by restaurants, hair salons, event venues, funeral parlors and more—and it could open the door to discrimination against people of minority faiths, against women, against single parents, and more.

TALKING ABOUT THE ISSUES INVOLVED IN MASTERPIECE

The discussion points below were developed for conversations about the Masterpiece Cakeshop case. While these messages can also be helpful in discussing similar future cases or the underlying issues more broadly, please consult with legal and/or policy experts to ensure that they apply to the specifics of a given case or situation.

It’s not about cake, flowers or invitations. It’s about discrimination.

• As a nation, we decided more than a half-century ago that businesses that are open to the public should be open to everyone on the same terms. Protecting people from discrimination is part of our country’s promise of equal treatment under the law for everyone. No business open to the public has a constitutional right to discriminate against a customer based on their religion, gender, race, sexual orientation, or gender identity.

• State and federal nondiscrimination laws ensure that people previously subject to discrimination can go about their lives without worrying whether they will be turned away from a business simply because of who they are.
UNDERSTANDING MASTERPIECE CAKESHOP AND SIMILAR CASES ABOUT SERVICE REFUSALS

- Businesses can make decisions about what kinds of products or services they will provide—but they can’t pick and choose who they will serve. With respect to the specifics of the Masterpiece case, that means that no bakery has to sell wedding cakes, but if it chooses to do so, it can’t turn some customers away just because of who they are.

- The Supreme Court’s ruling in the Masterpiece case affirmed the basic principle that businesses that open their doors to the public should be open to all—and that states can protect LGBT people from discrimination in the marketplace.

- Businesses and their owners have a right to express themselves and to their religious beliefs—but those freedoms don’t give businesses the right to discriminate when serving their customers. The Constitution does not protect the right of a bakery or a florist to post a sign that says, “We Don’t Serve Gay People.”

- Permitting businesses that open their doors to the public to exempt themselves from laws against discrimination would mean sliding backwards to a time when such businesses engaged in blatant discrimination against people based on religion, race, gender and more. We can’t go back to the days when businesses could say to customers, “We don’t serve your kind here.”

- This isn’t the first time that courts have encountered, and rejected, objections by businesses to nondiscrimination laws on religious or free speech grounds:
  - In 1964, soon after the federal Civil Rights Act was enacted to prohibit race discrimination by places of public accommodation, a small chain of BBQ restaurants in South Carolina called Piggie Park continued to refuse service to Black customers.
  - The owner argued that his religious beliefs about integration should allow him to break the law; he lost at every stage, including at the Supreme Court. In fact, the Supreme Court cited this case in its Masterpiece decision, suggesting that such discrimination could also be prohibited when it comes to LGBT customers.
  - In 1983, the Supreme Court rejected Bob Jones University’s argument that it had a religious right to refuse to admit interracial couples and students who supported interracial marriage.
  - In Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations (1973), a newspaper argued for a free speech right to post “help wanted” ads that listed jobs for men and jobs for women separately, in violation of antidiscrimination laws.
  - And in Hishon v. King & Spalding (1984), a law firm sought to defend its refusal to hire women as partners, claiming the First Amendment allowed the partnership to choose to associate only with other men. The Supreme Court rejected both arguments.

Requiring businesses to follow state nondiscrimination laws does not violate constitutional protections for speech and religion.

- Freedom of religion is one of our most fundamental rights as Americans. But that freedom does not give any of us the right to harm other people, to impose our beliefs on others, or to discriminate.

- Our laws against discrimination apply to businesses that sell their goods to the public. Granting businesses like bakers and florists a right to turn away customers based on religious objections would create a sweeping license to discriminate and have far-reaching, damaging consequences.

- Providing commercial services doesn’t mean a business is endorsing anyone’s marriage, or agreeing with everything the customer believes. It simply means it is providing services to the public, and it is open to everyone on the same terms.

- The specifics of the baked goods and floral arrangements are a distraction. We are allowed to say and believe what we want in America, but we can’t discriminate—and free speech doesn’t mean a business open to the public can turn away customers just because of who they are, or not sell them products (no matter what that product is) that it sells to everyone else. For example, a law barring discrimination does not violate free speech protections because it requires a store to take down a sign that says “whites only.”

- These laws don’t stop business owners from expressing individual opinions or beliefs. That’s exactly what the owner of Masterpiece Cakeshop did by going on national TV and telling his story.

- If a bakery or florist routinely sells cakes and bouquets to straight couples, but refuses to sell them to a gay couple, that’s discrimination. This is very different from refusing to sell a product that a business doesn’t sell to any customers (e.g., a swastika cake). Businesses can have policies about the kinds of products they refuse to sell. What they can’t do is turn customers away simply because of who they are.

Creating a special carve out for “creativity” undermines the purpose of nondiscrimination protections.

• Businesses that sell products to the general public aren’t above the law just because there is a creative element to their work. There is no exemption for businesses with an “expressive” or “creative” element to turn customers away just because of who they are.

• If the Supreme Court carves out an exemption to anti-discrimination laws for “creative” businesses, any business that provides custom services or products could claim a right to violate nondiscrimination laws as they apply to others, not just LGBT people.

• It could mean a funeral home could refuse service to the surviving spouse of a gay couple, a salon could refuse to cut hair for a bat mitzvah, a printing company could refuse to sell invitations to a person of color, or a tailor could refuse to provide service to a man because he is transgender.

The consequences and harms of a decision in favor of discrimination would be far-reaching.

• If the Supreme Court ever rules that certain business are allowed to discriminate, that ruling would have implications reaching far beyond LGBT people. It could also threaten our longstanding protections against discrimination for people of color, women, people with disabilities, religious minorities and others.

• We are a diverse society, and many business owners—and their customers—are people of different faiths. And just because a business serves a customer it doesn’t mean they share or endorse everything that customer believes in. The best way we respect those differences is to ensure that all of us are able to go about our day-to-day lives free from discrimination. Businesses that open their doors to the public should be open to everyone on the same terms.
Frequently Asked Questions

Why shouldn’t bakeries, florists, or other business that serve the public be able to decide what kinds of cakes or creative products they will make?

Any business can decide what kind of products it will make. All that laws against discrimination—like the Colorado law at issue in the Masterpiece case—say is that, once a business that opens its doors to the public and decides to sell a particular product, it can’t refuse to sell that product to someone because of who they are—for example, because they are lesbian, Jewish, or Black. These businesses are just being asked to follow the law and provide the same services to gay couples that it provides to straight couples.

Why shouldn't businesses open to the public be able to refuse to provide a service for a wedding, if they object? What about religious freedom?

Laws against discrimination apply to businesses that open their doors to the public to sell a product. These laws say, for example, that once a business decides to sell flowers for a wedding, it can't discriminate as to whom it sells flowers. When a business sells products to the public, providing a commercial product like a flowers isn't endorsing any customer or their beliefs. It is simply providing a commercial product. While weddings themselves are certainly expressive, that expression is of the couple's commitment and values, not those of the bakery, the dress shop, the hair salon, or any other provider. Nobody goes to a wedding and thinks that the bakery, the florist, or caterer, or other service provider is endorsing anything about the couple.

Religious freedom is a fundamental American value, which is why it is protected in the First Amendment of the Constitution. But that freedom doesn't give anyone the right to harm others, impose their beliefs on others, or to discriminate. This is why the courts have previously rejected businesses that have sued for the right, on religious grounds, to discriminate against African Americans, interracial couples, and more.

Why would anyone want to get a wedding-related services like a cake or flowers from a business that objected to their wedding?

The question at the center of these cases isn't about where to buy a cake or flowers or wedding invitations; it's about whether a whole range of businesses that are open to the public can discriminate in such a way that people will never know when they might be served or when they might be turned away. It's about whether we can enforce our longstanding laws against discrimination. No one should have to endure the humiliation and shame of being turned away from a business because of who they are. The only way to prevent that harm is to apply the laws evenly.

Does this mean a Jewish bakery has to bake a pro-Nazi cake, or a KKK cake?

No. The bakery in the Masterpiece Cakeshop case routinely sells wedding cakes to straight couples, but it refused to sell a wedding cake to a gay couple because they are gay. That is discrimination, and it's very different from refusing to sell a product that a business doesn't sell to anyone, like a swastika cake. A business can have policies about the kinds of products it refuses to sell. What it can't do is refuse service because of who the customer is.
